"You're too small and skinny to play championship basketball", they told BOB COUSY. But Bob showed them it's your SPEED and TRAINING that count. Now this great basketball star will share his training secrets with you!

JOE LOUIS was a poor boy—and they tried to push him around. But Joe developed his shoulder, his footwork and timing 'til no body alive could stay in the ring with him. Now Joe will teach YOU how to defend yourself!

They trained themselves to be Champions...

DUTY TRAIL

THE rider paused to let his horse drink at the narrow brook that ran through the range grass. He sat there contemplatively, building a quirley with one practiced hand . . . a young man, not over twenty, with a good build, wide shoulders, narrow flanks, and a bronzed, lean face.

Against the faded blue of his well-worn shirt and the hand-scraped leather of his vest shone the bright, new nickel plate of a tin-star. The engraving read: Deputy Sheriff. The way the young man wore the badge might have indicated it had been there a long time. What it also betrayed was the fact that it had hung there a very short time . . . less than a week. He could not help being young and full of ambition; he could not help being normally and vastly proud of his position. All his life he had wanted to be a Sheriff . . . and to be a deputy for some years was a good long step to the ultimate goal.

Suddenly, the quirley fell from his mouth. A shot had echoed in the low hills back of him; the horse stirred restlessly. His eyes ranged the whole horizon. Then the man who had fired the shot came riding over a low rise; he fired once more as he had before . . . in the air. Now the lawman realized the shots were a signal.

"Jim! Jim Tally!" he yelled to the deputy sheriff.

It was Havemayer, owner of the town's feed store. Middle-aged, fat, he sat in his saddle with some difficulty. He was out of breath with the jouncing of the high-horned saddle when he drew rein.

"What's wrong" Tally demanded.

"Plenty," Havemayer said, after a pause. "The Sheriff's fallen off his cayuse and sprained both his ankles badly. He wants you to come in right away. But that is not all, Jim . . . he was going in after Bart Rudgers today. Bart's court notice . . ."

"I know, yesterday was the deadline," Tally said in excitement. "If he didn't appear yesterday the Sheriff was goin' up in the hills after him."

"He can't go now . . . you'll have to go!"

A tiny chill crept through Jim Tally's genuine enthusiasm. He knew all about the law; he knew the dangers he'd face as a lawman. He'd known many things about being a lawman ever since he'd been a boy. But this was his first contact with duty. Riding out on the range to make a general patrol was duty, but it was in no sense real lawman duty. Rudgers was one of the real duties, now. He was one of the first ranch barons of that part of the West. A hard-fisted man, tough, grasping, he had built up his immense spread from the open range in a day when the first who came was the one who took most. He'd taken it legally enough. But in the taking and the growth of his wealth, Bart Rudgers had grown arrogant; he had forgotten his obligation to the community that alone made his wealth possible. A month before he'd failed to contribute his share of water to the general range pool from the dammed-up streams that crossed his land. A stringent court order had been served. The county was out to censure and fine Bart Rudgers . . . but to do that they'd have to make him appear.

The deputy sheriff wheeled his horse, and followed by Havemayer galloped back toward Graysville. The town itself would have to be crossed to hit the trail to the Rudgers spread. And Tally had to see the sheriff. Sheriff Len Grader was sitting propped up on a couch in his neat little white frame house on the outskirts of Graysville. The interview was brief.

"This is your chance, son," Grader said. "Rudgers is a tough nut to crack, and it'll be a tough job to bring him in. The thing is, you've got to bring him in, somehow. If you don't . . . and I can't, now . . . the whole prestige of the law in this county is at stake." He peered up keenly at Tally. "At the same time, I wouldn't blame you if you backed out. There's older men I can deputize. You're young, inexperienced; you don't know how men like Bart Rudgers operate."

Jim Tally shook his head and touched his tin-star.

"I can't go back on this," he said.

Grader kept looking at him. "Rudgers has a tough bunkhouse crew," he said. "And they've always backed him to the hilt."

"I'm still going," Tally said. His hands moved unconsciously to the butt of his right, holstered six-gun.

"Don't depend on a gun, boy. There'll be a dozen men there with Bart; you can't cow a dozen armed men with only a pair of hog-legs."

Which was true, Jim Tally decided, as he bade Grader goodbye, went outside and mounted. High-tailing it out of town, he kept thinking. The guns at his hips were useless now, except as vague symbols of authority in connection with his tin badge. The tin badge was the thing. But he also knew it was mighty thin metal . . . no proof at all against a bullet.

An hour and three quarters later, after heading constantly into hilly ground, Tally came on the first post-signs of the Bar Bart spread. It was a vast one, consisting of well over twenty thousand acres. Across a shallow valley, and a mile down a stream he could glimpse the tin roof of the Rudgers ranchhouse. A half hour later he was riding in at the gate.

Rudgers was out in the horse barn. It was to silence that the deputy sheriff arrived. He stood in the ranchyard, after dismounting, and waited. Presently, one of Rudgers waddies spied him. After a moment other men drifted in; then big, burly Rudgers himself. Tally's throat tightened. The silence continued. Finally ten men besides the ranch boss had gathered. Tally slowly took his official court order out of his pocket and read it.

"You're ordered to appear in court now," Tally said. "Let's go."

Rudgers shook his head.

"I'm not goin'," he said. "Not with a pipsqueak like you." He grinned. "Now maybe if the state governor asked me, real polite . . ."

"You'll come," Tally said quietly.

"You want to fight, maybe?" Rudgers said, with heavy humor. "Maybe you'd like to fight me?"

"I wouldn't fight you . . . or any man here," Tally said . . . and then a gale of scornful laughter broke from eleven throats.

"Why should I?" he demanded, turning on the bunkhouse crew. "A lawman doesn't fight citizens . . . he fights criminals!"

There was an abrupt silence . . . but a different, shocked kind of silence.

"Anybody here claiming to be a criminal?" Tally asked, amiably. "If anybody wants to be one, all he has to do is resist the law."

Bart Rudgers glanced round him quickly, uneasily.

"The law!" He burst out.

"I said the Law," Tally kept on, doggedly. He tapped his tin badge. "This is just a piece of metal." He tapped his guns. "These are just two old rusty shooting irons with barrels almost worn out. They're not the law . . ."

"Well, what is the law?" The ranch boss blustered.

Tally paused, looking from face to face.

"The law is you," he said. "You, Joe Bradley, you Phil Kane . . ." He named them all, and glanced at Bart Rudgers. "Even you, Rudgers . . . unless you want to stop being the law. All of you are the law, and I'm your appointed representative."

"You . . . why you . . . !"

"Yes, I am!" Tally said calmly. "Without the law, not one of your lives would be worth a lead nickel. In the old days lives weren't worth even that. Why? Because men didn't recognize the law. Their lives and their property became worthwhile even to themselves the moment they did." Again he tapped his tin badge. "It that means anything, your own rights mean something; if it doesn't you don't have a right you can call your own. After all, you all elected Len Grader Sheriff . . . or are you canceling your votes now?"

Bart Rudgers looked around him, paling. Every formerly friendly face was now grave and reserved. He shrugged, then grinned wryly. "All right!" he bawled. "Joe, saddle my cayuse. I'm going in with this young squirt." He cast an admiring glance at Tally. "I reckon I'll be smart and give in . . . iron men and iron guns can't prevail against words of gold!"
